

This coloring page was adapted from a white-line print called Blue Water Fisherman, created in Provincetown over 100 years ago by the artist Bror Julius Olsson Nordfeldt. Born in Sweden in 1878, BJO immigrated with his family to Chicago, Illinois, when he was 13. He worked as a printer's assistant and studied Japanese woodblock prints before moving to Provincetown in 1914, where he and other artists perfected the white-line print, or Provincetown Print. To create a white-line print, the artist carves an image into one block of wood, then paints sections of the wood and lays paper over the image, rubbing the back of the paper to transfer the image onto the paper from the block. These prints are named "white-lines" because the paper picks up the paint from the surface of the block, and the carved, concave lines remain white, or the color of the paper.

This painting is called American Coffee and Danish, done in 1968 by Alvin Ross. Alvin studied art throughout his whole life, learning to paint everyday objects in a photographic way. In this photo-realistic painting, notice the shine of the coffee pot and the reflection of other objects in its surface. This type of painting is called a still-life, because it captures a moment in time of everyday life. Below, can you create a still-life drawing of your table?

This painting is called Cat at the Window, by Dorothy Lake Gregory. Dorothy was born in Brooklyn, NY in 1893 and showed an interest in art from an early age. Her father was an editor at the New York Tribune, and by the age of eight Dorothy had joined the “family business,” publishing pen and ink drawings in newspapers! In 1914 she moved to Provincetown and is well-remembered as a successful illustrator and accomplished printmaker. Cat at the Window portrays the back of a cat staring out a window at a boat sailing by. How does Dorothy use different colors here? Why do you think she chose the colors that she did? What do you think the cat is thinking about? Write a few lines below about what might be going through the cat’s brain.
